PHD (Honors) Cairo University - Egypt - May 2000

PhD in International Construction Contract Arbitration, States' Contracts. The Thesis discussed infrastructure Project Contracts in Egypt and developing countries adopting the civil law legal culture and containing foreign private entities.

- The main concern of the thesis is to prove the deterioration of ' Le Contrat Administratif' in civil law countries. This was done through examining the new legal nature of the contracts and arbitrations. The new conditions of the new administrative contracts were analyzed and concluded that the contracts have a new legal hybrid nature. This entailed the use of new mechanisms in the settlement of resulting disputes, particularly arbitration; in details (both FIDIC form of contracts and ICC arbitration have a special significance in the study).
- The thesis consists of two sections. The first section is a comparative study to the French legal system. The second section is a complete comparative study to the common law jurisdictions (this was made possible by living in London for more than one year, as a student in the University of London).
- PhD Research student on International Construction Contract Arbitration. (IALS) London. Aug 1994-Sept 1995.

This book is a fundamental guide for academics and practitioners in the construction arbitration sphere. It scrutinizes the main features, and substantive characteristics of construction contracts. It is a reference to states' agreements with private foreign entities. It subjects law and practice in the MENA region to clarify critical issues such as delay and extension of time, LDs, and many other issues relating to arbitration. Authors present useful insights on a number of complex topics relating to states' infrastructure agreements. This monograph analyzes interim measures in international arbitration from international perspectives. It highlights comparative legislation and different institutional rules. It scrutinizes Egyptian arbitration law as it is adopting UNCITRAL Model Law. Authors capture with authoritative structure the pulse and dynamics of the legal framework of construction arbitration and special difficulties such as the time bar in the FIDIC forms of contracts and in ICSID arbitration, the role of the engineer in construction contracts, and multi-party arbitration in construction agreements. Authors also provide useful insights to PPPs and BOT/BOOT agreements.
